Extensive properties depend on the amount of matter that is being measured. These include mass and volume. Physical properties can be measured without changing the chemical's identity. The freezing point of a substance is physical. When water freezes, it's still H₂O. Chemical properties deal with how one chemical reacts with another. We know that wood is flammable because it becomes heat, ash, and carbon dioxide when heated in the presence of oxygen.

General Chemistry/Properties of Matter/Basic Properties of Properties of matter, defined by Education Portal, are divided into two groups: physical properties that include color, density, mass, boiling point, volume, solubility, malleability and temperature; and chemical properties that include reactivity with oxygen, reactivity with water, flammability, pH ...
